John R. Culbreth, Lori L. Brown

State of the Art in Clinical Supervision John R. Culbreth, Lori L. Brown, 2009-10-19 There have been many recent developments in the research, theory, and practice of supervision in counseling, but few reliable resources are available for practitioners seeking to expand their knowledge in these areas. Culbreth and Brown have assembled a group of leading researchers, scholars, and professionals in the field to present a collection of chapters on the state of the art in clinical supervision. These chapters provide the reader with fresh approaches to core topics, such as multicultural competence, religion and spirituality, and the training of supervisors, as well as discussions of new areas of study. Alternative methods to conducting supervision are explored with expressive art techniques and the uses of narrative therapy and concepts of emotional intelligence. Triadic supervision and the use of the newest developments in technology are also considered. Current and future supervisors will no doubt find the innovative and informative strategies described in this book invaluable in their work with supervisees.

Exploring Supervisor and Supervisee Experiences of Triadic Supervision Emily C. Derrick, 2010 This dissertation research focused on supervisor and supervisee experiences within the triadic supervision triad. Triadic supervision is an emerging method of supervision within counselor education. It is fast becoming the preferred mode of supervision in counselor education programs. Unfortunately, there is very little research to support the efficacy of this approach. This project focused on an area that has been under-studied in counselor education literature. I examined the perceptions and experiences of the supervisor and both supervisees within a specific triad. Current literature has examined supervisors' experiences in triadic supervision. Likewise, there is emerging research on experiences of supervisees within triadic supervision, but no study to date has examined the simultaneous experiences of an intact triad. This research was qualitative in nature and was conducted through in-depth face to face interviews. The data was analyzed using basic interpretive qualitative techniques. These findings will contribute to the limited but growing body of knowledge that exists concerning triadic supervision. Additionally, these findings will have the potential to improve understanding within counselor education about the experiences of those participating in triadic supervision. This research also has the potential to impact the way in which this form of supervision is delivered and the quality of supervision that future counselors-in-training receive.

Experience of Role Discernment and Disclosure in Triadic Supervision Marlise R. Lonn, 2015 This study focused on student counselors engaged in triadic supervision during practicum. The purpose was to understand participants' role discernment and disclosure experiences. This research study used transcendental phenomenological inquiry and analysis methodology. Ten ethnically diverse female participants were interviewed for this project. Interviews allowed participants to explore their experiences and understanding of role discernment and disclosure as a new supervisee in the triadic supervision setting. Results yielded three subsequent themes related to role discernment: the experience of newness (subthemes: new counselor, new supervisee, lacking preparation), dependence on supervisor (subthemes: supervisor expectations, supervision activities, meaning of supervision), and impact of supervision (subthemes: self-awareness, self-care, and consultation). The essence of participant's role discernment experience was changed perception of self and other. Inquiry into disclosure experiences yielded the following themes: relationships (subthemes: supervisor, triad), presence of peer (subthemes: aided disclosure, impeded disclosure), and sharing time. The essence of participants' disclosure experiences was identified as heightened awareness. Results of this study extend triadic supervision research to include the experiences of ethnically diverse participants. Implications of this study include understanding the role discernment experiences of practicum supervisees in the context of triadic supervision. Additionally, implications for supervisor and counselor educators are explored and the need for advanced preparation for supervision is emphasized.
